This morning, I lost Little Fox in the park.

We searched and we searched

until long after dark,

But we just couldn't find him, and now all I see
Is the space next to Big Fox where Little should be.

My heart and my eyelids are heavy as stone
As I think of my fox in the park all alone.

But then, from outside, something's calling my name.
I'm drawn to the window, a moth to the flame.

A beautiful fox, sitting there in the snow.
Her fur is afire and her eyes are aglow.
She nods and then walks past the old letterbox,
And I make my decision to follow the fox.

I pull on my coat and I scamper outside,
And there, by the tree, stands my rusty red guide.

She reminds me of Little - her tail's just like his.
And maybe, just maybe, she knows where he is.
