Q&A

WITH DHONIELLE CLAYTON

Trapped at a luxurious resort off the coast of Florida, a group of elite teens are about to have a spring break they will never forget... but not all of them are coming home. A star-studded team of authors (Dhonielle Clayton, Tiffany D. Jackson, Nic Stone, Angie Thomas, Ashley Woodfolk and Nicola Yoon) return with a thriller full of intrigue, betrayal, and heart-stopping romance.

Who came up with the idea for the book, and how did the co-authoring process work between the group?

After writing 'Blackout' and 'Whiteout', we wanted to do something different. I remember being in a hotel in Los Angeles talking with Ashley about what we should do next. She suggested we try something more genre-focused, maybe even spooky. I immediately thought of a murder mystery thriller, especially since Tiffany D. Jackson is so strong in that space. We started imagining something with a 'Knives Out' feel, and it was one of those moments where everything just clicked.

The co-authoring process worked well because we all leaned into our strengths. I focused on structure and the overall framework. Tiffany brought suspense and tension. Nic is great with dialogue and voice. Angie adds humor. Nicola focuses on romance and connection. Ashley brings emotional depth.

We began by outlining the structure, then built the characters together, including their secrets and motivations. From there, we mapped out the twists and how everything would unfold.

What did you enjoy most about writing 'Breakout', and what inspired you to write it?

I most enjoyed developing the secrets and figuring out how to reveal them over time. It was fun to explore who was lying to whom and how those lies would unravel. Brainstorming with the group about the characters' secrets and how they would try to hide them was a highlight.

We were inspired by a gap in the young adult mystery thriller space. Outside of Tiffany's work, there were not many stories centered on messy Black teens getting into complicated situations. We wanted to show that kind of story, with characters who are flawed, chaotic, and fully human.

I was also excited to write about a setting I know well. I grew up in the Washington, D.C. suburbs around families connected to the U.S. government. Many of those kids lived under constant scrutiny, with security, media attention, and limited freedom. Bringing that environment into the story felt both meaningful and fun.

If you were part of this friend group, which character would you be?

I would like to say River. She is put-together, smart, and always in control. Her mom handles crises, and that influence shows in how she moves through the world.

In reality, I am probably closer to Sydney or Noelle. Sydney has her own messiness, and Noelle feels things deeply and can be a bit chaotic. So while I aim to be like River, I am likely somewhere closer to the messier side of the group.

Dear Reader,

Riddle me this: what do six author-friends who've cowritten two successful interconnected romance novels—one set in summer, the other in winter—decide to do for their third trip around the narrative block (pun very much intended)? A third collection of interconnected love stories, perhaps set during the sweetness of spring or the coziness of fall, would make the most sense, yes? Hello, #CuffingSeason!

Which is precisely why we made things incredibly hard on ourselves and went in a totally different direction. Gotta keep y'all on your toes or whatnot.

That's exactly what the book you're holding attempts to do. It's twisty and turny and head-spinny and murderly. The tea is hot and it gets spilled (alongside the blood ☹️). And while there's humor (shout-out to Angie), kissing (Hey, Nicola!), lush descriptions of food (looking at you, Dhonielle), betrayal galore (thanks, Tiffany!), prose so gorgeous it'll make you teary-eyed (an Ashley signature), more parenthetical asides than you'll know what to do with (gotta love that Nic), and romances blooming like roses through cracks in concrete—it wouldn't be an Out book without all of those things—you'll also be on the edge of your seat with every page turn.

Why? Well . . . why not?

At the heart of Breakout was our desire to do something we hadn't seen done before: to cocreate a novel full of kids none of us had ever seen on the page. Kids who are wealthy. Intellectually gifted. Well connected. Socially powerful. Full of confidence and bravado (and messiness). And most importantly: Black.

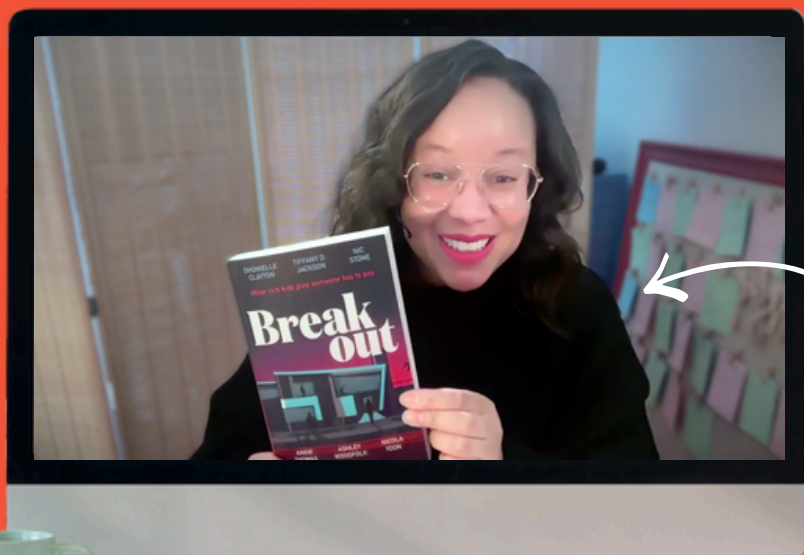

We wanted to tell a story that hasn't been told. To create a world that's vastly different from the ones Black kids are typically permitted to inhabit in books. To craft a tale where the enemy isn't racism or oppression but one's own secrets and the pressure to keep up appearances.

We wanted to give you something new.
Hope you survive it.

With love (always!),

Angie, Ashley, and Nicola
