Dad's favourite film is Dead Poets Society. Sure, he likes others, but when he wants to chill with me on the sofa at the weekend and there's no football on TV, it's almost guaranteed that he'll suggest we watch it. I'm not that bothered about the old movie but I love spending time with Dad, eating spicy plantain crisps and drinking Coke. So, even though half of the film goes over my head, I know some of the lines by heart. Like, "Carpe diem. Seize the day, boys, make your lives extraordinary." That's what the teacher says to the boys in the movie.

Dad whispered, "Carpe diem," to me this morning as he hugged me tight before he left for work, his goatee brushing against my cheek. I know what he was getting at. He was telling me to seize the day, 'cause today is the day I start Nunford School.

The mega-expensive private school offers a full scholarship to a couple of state-school children every year starting in Year Seven. Mum wanted Abigail to do the scholarship exams when she was younger, but she refused. She and Mum argued about it for ages, but Abigail dug her heels in. She's always been able to stand up to Mum – which is amazing because I can't. Not at all!

"It's my life and I don't want to go to that snooty school," she'd say.

Mum would reply, "Who cares if it's snooty! You're Black. You need the best education you can get to compete in the real world."

But Abigail wouldn't budge, so Mum had no choice but to allow her to go to St Vincent, the local secondary. Now that Abigail is about to start sixth form, she and Mum are arguing again because Mum wants her to go to university, but Abigail is having none of it. She says she wants to be earning ASAP! She has an offer for an engineering apprenticeship with a big company where she did a summer job this year. They've offered her a place as long as she gets good grades in her A levels. I'm sure she'll do that because she's clever ... unlike me. Dad is proud of Abigail for going into engineering, but he barely says anything when Mum is going on and on. He once told me that he stays quiet so that Mum doesn't give him wahala. I get that. That's why I stay quiet too. And that's why I'm going to Nunford School today, even though I'm really not sure I'll like it there.

It was such a shock when I found out that I'd been given one of the scholarships. Sure, I sat the exam last year because Mum insisted on it. But when I was called for an interview with Mr Fortesque, the headteacher, it was an absolute nightmare until I mentioned I'd love to be a professional athlete.

"Doing what?" Mr Fortesque asked straight away, looking me dead in the eye.

“Running,” I said quietly, wondering why he was so interested.

I don’t even know why I brought it up. I’ve never talked about wanting to run professionally to anyone – not Abigail, Dad or Mum. I’m afraid they’ll think it’s silly and try to change my mind, especially Mum. She thinks running is something you do when you’re playing. But Mr Fortesque seemed to take me seriously because next thing I knew, he’d called Mr Dunn, the Head of Sports, to come and meet me. I was taken to the school’s athletics track, which blew my mind. I swear down, it was a mini stadium, right there in the school field! Mr Dunn gave me a spare Nunford PE kit that was way too baggy, and black spikes that were a little tight. He told me to run around the track twice.

When he blew his whistle, it felt weird running in a kit that wasn’t my own and being watched by someone with a timer in his hand. But as I sped up, everything faded away apart from the happy, tingling feeling inside. I love running. When I run, something happens to me that I can’t fully explain. It’s like I’m free and floating on air like ... a super-fast superhero. It feels amazing! I could have run forever on the Nunford school track. It was so much better than any surface I’d run on before. I had to stop when Mr Dunn blew his whistle, and that’s when he said something which, all this time later, still makes me smile.

“You are good. Very good, in fact.”

I was ECSTATIC! It was the first time someone had said that to me about my running.

A couple of months after that, a letter from the school arrived offering me the scholarship. Dad looked at me with shiny eyes. He said, “You did it, son,” and squeezed me tight. Abigail gave me a funny look and a nod – like I’d gone up in her estimation. Mum shouted, “Thank you, God!” She made sure she told all our friends and family the news.

Then the local paper heard about it and a journalist came to interview me in the flat with Mum and Dad, which was a bit nerve-wracking. The journalist told us that I was the first person from Exby to ever get a scholarship to Nunford School. When the article was published in the paper with a photograph and everything, I became famous in Exby. Well, for a while anyway. Our friends, people from church and just random strangers would stop me in the street and shake my hand.

“You’ve made us proud,” they would say.

“How?” I said to Mum. “I haven’t even started the school yet! Why are they putting pressure on me?”

“Pressure? They’re proud of you because you’ve got an opportunity that people around here don’t dream of getting.”

I let it go. I didn’t want another Mum lecture on why it’s important to want to become Somebody.

On Saturday, a few weeks later, when I was lounging on the sofa watching Sports Roundup on TV, Mum walked into the living room with a sheet of paper in her hand.

“Nunford School has sent more information about the scholarship,” she said, standing in front of the TV with a frown on her face. “They say you must attend athletics club and try for the athletics team.”

My heart skipped a beat. “Seriously?” I said, sitting up.

“Yes, it says here that it’s a condition of your scholarship. Typical! Expecting Black children to only be good at sports.”

I kept my face blank but inside I was doing my happy dance. I must have got the scholarship because of my run! Apart from my best mate, Charlie, I hadn’t told anyone about my run at Nunford School. Not even when Mum fired questions at me when she came to pick me up that day. I wanted to enjoy the memory in peace without anyone ruining it for me.

“It also says you have to maintain good grades,” said Mum. “That I agree with. It’s the most important thing. Don’t worry about the running.”

I wasn’t worried about the running. I was buzzing! When Mum left, I sat grinning, thinking Mr Dunn must really rate me. For a moment, I actually looked forward to going to Nunford School. Then I remembered that going there meant going to school without Charlie. We’ve been mates since he started Exby Primary in Year Three.

I know he wishes I was going to St Vincent with him. I mean, he hasn’t come out and said it or anything.

But all summer, he's been banging on about how I'm going to change and become all posh. I've told him a bunch of times that I won't.

But even on Friday, as we played Mario Kart on his Nintendo Switch in his and his mum's flat, he said I won't want to know him once I have fancy new friends.

"Bruv," I said. "There's as much chance of that as there is of me getting tall like you."

That made him laugh. "Zero chance then."

"Exactly," I said.

That was three days ago. Today, I woke up to my stomach doing somersaults. I told Mum my tummy wasn't too good, but she insisted I eat the full English breakfast she had specially cooked for me to give me strength for my big day. I couldn't say no when she'd gone to so much trouble. But eating it was so not a good idea. My insides are now spinning around like a washing machine. I just pray I don't throw up. It wouldn't be a good look to have sick down my front when I start at Nunford.

Mum and I have just got on the jam-packed 304 bus to Nunford. Mum's leading the way, squeezing past people in the aisle as we look for somewhere to sit. Among the children on the bus, I can't see anyone else wearing the Nunford school uniform. The bus is full of chat. And a bit too warm. It's a good thing I left my new coat at home – I already have a jumper and a blazer on – I'd be boiling by now.

"Eh, Evelyn. Good morning."

The shrill voice belongs to a dark-skinned woman in the aisle seat by the exit door. I recognise her – she's one of Mum's regulars at her hair salon.

"Oh, Vida. How are you?"

I follow as Mum makes a beeline for her friend.

"I'm fine, by the grace of God."

"Kofi, say hello to Auntie Vida."

"Hello, Auntie," I say politely.

"Hello, Kofi. You're looking very handsome today."

I give a tight smile, though I know for a fact I look like a pint-sized man on his way to work. There's a silly hat that I'm supposed to wear as well but that's hidden in my school rucksack. If people see me in a felt cap in Exby, they'll laugh their heads off! I'll put it on when I get there.

"You're right, Vida." Mum smiles, her eyes twinkling. "Baby K is looking dashing this morning."

There she goes again, calling me "Baby K" in public. Yes, even though I'm eleven and starting secondary school, Mum still sees me as her baby. It's sooo embarrassing. Already, because of my shorter-than-average height, low-cropped hair and round, dimpled face, people think I'm younger than my age. So Mum's nickname doesn't help! I did ask her once to stop calling me that, but when she said, "It's a term of endearment, Kofi," I just sighed and went quiet. I can't stand up to Mum. I hate it when she's upset or angry with me, so I just do what she wants me to do.

"It's lovely to see a young man presenting himself so well." Auntie Vida looks at Mum. "You've done such a good job with Kofi, Evelyn ... and you're looking lovely too."

Mum smiles with her whole face. "Oh, thank you," she says in the high-pitched voice that comes out when she's pleased. She moves her body from side to side to allow her friend to have a good look at her red skirt and matching lacy top. Mum is short and likes to squeeze herself into clothes that are a bit too small for her. Plus, you always know she's going somewhere special when she tries to make herself look taller by wearing high heels and having a high hairstyle. Today, she has on black high-heeled boots and has styled her straightened hair into a big beehive thing. I can smell the flowery perfume she normally wears to go to church. All of this to take me to my new school. She is sooo over the top!

"You must be off somewhere special," Auntie Vida says.

"Kofi is starting Year Seven at Nunford School today," Mum says proudly, making sure the other passengers hear her.

And they do. People start staring and whispering.

"Of course!" says Auntie Vida. "Eh, Kofi. Starting Nunford School today. You're putting Exby on the map."

Really?

"Congratulations, my sister." The tall Black man standing next to Mum leans over. “I knew your son looked familiar. He was in the paper, wasn’t he?”

“Yes, he was,” says Mum, smiling.

“Good on him. I wish you all the best, son,” the man says, looking at me.

Feeling like I have to say something, I mumble, “Thank you.”

“Thank you so much,” says Mum, her smile even bigger than before.

Mum, Auntie Vida and the tall man carry on talking about the future I could have. I know going to Nunford School is a big deal, but do they have to go on and on about it?

Luckily, the man gets off at the next bus stop and I hear Auntie Vida say, “Are you working today, Evelyn? I was going to pass by after my shift to see if you could squeeze me in.”

“I’ll be working from late morning,” replies Mum. “I’ve a few appointments booked in, but you’re welcome to come after work, if you’re happy to wait.”

Mum will never turn away a client. It’s a sign of how much this means to her that she isn’t starting work at her usual time of 8.30. Our living room in the flat doubles up as Mum’s hair salon. From morning till evening, she has clients, mostly from our neighbourhood, coming in and out.

Dad could have brought me in his car but he had an early appointment today installing someone’s boiler. He’s a self-employed gas engineer.

“Emmanuel, you go to work. I’ll take him,” Mum had insisted.

Mum is still busy chatting, so I guess we’re not looking for a place to sit any more. At least the other passengers are no longer looking at me and my stomach is calming down. I gaze out of the window at the Exby tower blocks and terraced houses as the bus moves from one stop to another. When I start to see swanky flats and large, fancy houses, I know we’ve reached Nunford. I’ve only been to Nunford five times and that includes the days I did the exam and the headmaster’s interview. I swear, you must be loaded to live here. Everything looks so expensive. I bet everybody who lives here owns their own home.

I actually know four people who own their homes and they're my grandparents. Mum's parents in Ghana, Nana and Grandpa, had their two-storey house built for them in Accra. Dad's parents, Gran and Grandad, sold their council flat when they retired and now live in a bungalow by the sea. Other than them, everyone else I know rents like us.

Nunford and Exby may be on the same bus route but that's all they have in common. Look at all the different shops, restaurants and coffee shops here.

It definitely puts Exby to shame, but ... I still love living there.

A glimpse of a white building at the end of the high street makes me swallow hard. In what seems like no time at all, the bus is in front of a large gated entrance, with a big white sign on the side. Nunford School is written in black letters with a crest of something that looks like an eagle above and some Latin words that I can't even pronounce below. I glance at Mum, still chatting, not even noticing where we are.

"Mum," I say. "We need to get off."

"Oh! Look at me now. I nearly missed the stop," she says, hurriedly pressing the button on the metal pole near her.

A moment later, the bus jerks to a standstill at the bus stop just past the school gate. We step out into the sunshine and a welcome breeze. I swear, the air smells different here – more ... fresh. Mum waves goodbye to her friend as the bus moves on and we walk towards the gate.

At the sight of the school, we both stop. The long, winding drive leads to huge, grand buildings, surrounded by extensive green grounds. It looks like something out of a film and ... even more intimidating than I remember. My head starts pounding.

Mum says, "Look at it, Baby K. This is your school now. When you go to a school like this, the world is your oyster. You can become a doctor, lawyer, politician, even prime minister."

I glance at her, not saying a word. Thanks, Mum! Talk about laying on the pressure!

"We better hurry. You don't want to be late on your first day," Mum says.

"Are you coming down the drive as well? I thought we were going to say bye here,” I say, panicked. If Mum walks down with me, I just know that she’ll get emotional in front of all those people and I’ll be embarrassed. “I can walk by myself, Mum.”

“What do you mean?” says Mum. “Of course I’m walking with you.” She strides off down the pavement next to the drive, leaving me no choice but to follow her.

Apart from a frizzy-haired girl already halfway down the pavement, I can’t see anyone else walking. Car after car swishes past us, stopping in front of the white, double-fronted main school building for children to pop out and climb up the grand stairs to the massive wooden entrance door.

We’ve only been walking a few minutes when I see Mum starting to hobble in her high-heeled boots. Clearly they were meant for posing and not standing all the way here on the bus and then walking. Why did she wear those silly boots anyway? A large silver Mercedes drives past and two white boys in the back point at Mum and laugh. That’s it!

“Mum,” I say, catching her up. “Thank you for walking down with me but I can see that your feet are hurting.” Mum shakes her head and opens her mouth, but I quickly add, “Let’s just say bye here. I’ll continue walking down and you can go back to catch the bus. Otherwise, your feet will be killing you and how will you stand to do people’s hair?”

Mum is quiet for a bit before reaching out for my face and kissing me on both cheeks. I cringe but say nothing.

“All right, Baby K, you have a point,” she says. “Thank you for thinking about me.”

Relieved, I nod and smile, willing her to start walking back.

“Make sure you apply yourself today and work very hard so that they know you mean business.”

“Yes, Mum. I promise,” I say.

“You’ve made me so proud, Baby K,” she says, this time with tears in her eyes. Oh no!

“I need to get going, Mum, so I’m not late. Remember?” I say. “Bye.” I start walking quickly down the drive before Mum starts crying and making a scene. When I glance back, it’s a relief to see her heading towards the gate. I love Mum but she's too much!

At the foot of the grand stairs, I stop and stare at the children in grey tweed pounding up the steps to the main school building. A sinking feeling washes over me. I can't see any other Black people! I suddenly wish I was starting St Vincent this morning with Charlie instead. I'd fit into St Vincent. There are all kinds of kids there. Here, I already stick out like a sore thumb.

But, remembering Dad's words, I slowly make my way up the steps with my rucksack in my hand, muttering "Carpe diem" to myself over and over again.

"Where is your cap, young man?" says a deep male voice.

Startled, my head jerks round to see the pale-faced headteacher, Mr Fortesque, looming large with his thinning brown hair and his Harry Potter-like cloak by the entrance door. Oh, the hat! Oh no, I forgot to put it on!

"Sorry, sir, it's in my bag," I say, bending over to hurriedly pull it out.

"It is meant to be on your head," replies Mr Fortesque. I shove the hat on my head. "Sorry, sir," I say.

"Your felt cap must be worn until you step inside," he says, gesturing to the main school building. "Since it is your first day here, Master Obeng, I will not give you a punishment. But if it happens again, you will get detention. The uniform policy must always be adhered to."

"Yes, sir," I say, surprised he remembers my name and that he's making such a fuss about a hat. Still, being told off by the headteacher on my first morning isn't exactly a great start.

"I'm sure things will all fall into place soon, Master Obeng," Mr Fortesque adds, the sides of his mouth lifting into some kind of smile.

I'm not so sure.

"Master Roberts," he calls out through the open front door to a lanky, dark-haired, older-looking boy standing in the hall a little way away, next to a group of six children. One of them looks like the frizzy-haired girl who was walking ahead of me on the drive.

She has her head down and looks uncomfortable. Maybe she's new like me. Near her, a tallish curly-haired, tanned boy stares at me before exchanging a smug smirk with the stocky ginger-haired boy next to him. Are they laughing at me? They look like the boys in the back of the silver Mercedes.

"This is Master Obeng," says Mr Fortesque to the dark-haired boy. "Please add him to the group of Year Sevens that you are in charge of."

"Yes, Mr Fortesque," the boy replies.

"Master Obeng, if you'd kindly join Master Roberts, he will take you to your form room."

"Thank you, sir," I say.

"Oh, and welcome to Nunford School."

Yeah. Some welcome.

Now that we're inside the main school building, it's so dark. Was it like this when I came before? I honestly don't remember. But walking down wood-panelled corridor after wood-panelled corridor today, it feels dark and echoey. Smells musty too. What's with all the paintings and photographs of white people on the walls? It's a bit creepy. I swear it seems like their eyes are following me. The sixth-former leading my group of Year Sevens says they are all old Nunfordians. I don't know many of them, but the ones I do recognise are famous actors or sports people. For real, some big
